Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Once a Week, Vol. 5 No, I have not, he answered. Come, then, drink up and let s go down, said his acquaintance. Not for me, thank you, said Brady. It s raining cats, dogs, and pitchforks. Can t you hear it? It won t hurt you for a minute or two. Not for me, thank you. I m not going out into it, not for twenty packet boats with twenty Robert Mortimer, Esquires, and friend on board. So Mr. Robert Mortimers gentleman stayed in the comfortable shelter of the Jolly Tars, and the other man went down to the pier alone. The storm raged through the night - the wind blew - the rain poured down. And so hour after hour rolled by till it was morning, and with the morning the storm abated. Whilst it was yet dark, but when the first faint streak of grey had appeared in the horizon, all questions were answered and doubts and misgivings put an end to, by the appearance of a bright light immediately opposite the pier. The boat was safe. Somewhat more people than usual were collected to witness the arrival of the packet; the motley assemblage of individuals whose business called them there - Post Office agents, newspaper couriers, customs officers, porters and loungers - was swelled by the addition of a good many persons who, alarmed by the severity of the storm, were willing to brave the elements in their eagerness to team the fate of the boat. Important news was expected by this mail; imperfect accounts and flying rumours of another savage attack on the life of Louis Philippe had readied England...
