Not illustrated. 1805 Excerpt: .the expense of large barns, it is remarked, by the fame writer, that it is in direct opposition to the opinions of the best hay-farmers in the country, and contrary to his own experience. Fot in the driest seasons barns are a saving of four or five shillings an acre; and, in wet seasons, the ready assistance which they afford in speedily securing the hay, has been known to make a difference in price of twenty shillings per load on a small number of loads. There are other advantages in the use of barns for this purpose, as there is not only less litter and waste, but, in merely hay districts, a great saving in straw, which is now an expensive article in many places, especially near large towns. But without having recourse to the erection Of expensive barns, many of the conveniences and advantages of them, especially those of saving the labour and expenses of thatching, may be obtained by the use of covered stieds, raifedon pillars or posts, and open on all the fides. These may be constructed in a cheap manner by having the roofs made with thin feather-edged boards, well payed over on the outside with tar Or paint. These arc light, cheap, and will last a great length of time by care in keeping them well painted. The expenses of mowing and making the hay in the first method, carrying, stacking, thatching, and other necessary operations, are thus stated by the...
