That would be very true if the first steps had not already been taken. It is not true when the first part of the work has been properly done. In the first place, the teacher should be able to get more than the pupil can out of even an unfamiliar subject. In the second place, she is assumed to have a more general store of knowledge than the pupil, and the ability to see the relation of things in a truer light. Hence she is supposed to be able to arrange the material gathered in the preceding work into a logical and consistent whole. Most pupils enjoy a lecture by the teacher when adapted to their needs and properly presented. In the primary grades the lecture should resemble a story; in the grammar grades statements should be more concise. If facts are properly arranged they are usually interesting in themselves. The baby-talk of the kindergarten and the primary grade is not necessary and should never be tolerated in the upper grades. The teacher in these grades should find the source of interest in the facts themselves, not in imaginary and fictitious resemblances, and should endeavor to awaken in her pupils a delight in truth for truth s sake. This often requires effort and careful preparation. The amount of matter to be presented orally in this way must depend on the grade, or rather the general maturity of the pupil. After an...
